Background of Mafeking

Introduction

In 1899, Colonel Robert Stephenson Smyth Baden-Powell was sent to South Africa to raise a force to help defend the lands Britain considered its own from the Boers (Dutch settlers). When war broke out, Baden-Powell was in the town of Mafeking (“Mafe-uh-keng”), having decided to use it as a staging area for supplies. Mafeking was a small town that lay about two miles off the Transvaal border, and was used as a rail-depot and garrison. Baden-Powell was unprepared for a siege, with few supplies and just 1,200 soldiers to hold the town of 8,000 against a force of some 9,000 Boers.

The siege lasted 217 days, with Baden-Powell successfully holding on until reinforcements arrived on May 17, 1900. The boys of Baden-Powell’s “Cadet Corps” were used as mailmen and couriers, as they were able to move freely about the area with little attention from the Boer soldiers. The siege was followed closely in England, and Baden-Powell returned a hero. Boys' organizations all over the country asked him to visit and speak of his adventures. A few years later, Baden-Powell held the first scout camp at Brownsea Island, and Boy Scouting began.

This exercise is designed to test Scouts on their ingenuity and scouting skills as they recreate the relief of Mafeking. Staged and conducted after dark, individual Scout Patrols will deliver food and essential materials to Col Baden-Powell, by way of an orienteering course, interspersed with intermediate Supply Stations, each with its own challenges and rewards. Scouts will have to draw on their individual and team skills to successfully navigate their way to Mafeking and deliver the supplies needed by Col Baden-Powell. And along the way, they will experience some of the history of Lord Baden-Powell and the origins of Scouting.

History of the Siege

Robert Stephenson Smyth Baden-Powell became the Commanding Chief of her Majesty's Forces in South Africa during the late 1800's. He was an excellent soldier and was well known for his ability as a spy and a commander.

The English Colony in Africa was heading quickly to a war with their Dutch neighbors, the Boers. Historians debate the events that led up to the siege of Mafeking, but the 217-day siege is one of the most fascinating stories in military strategy.

Baden-Powell was supposed to have a highly trained commando force under his command to use in fighting the Boers. But things didn't work out in his favor. He found himself quickly trapped in the small town of Mafeking with a terribly inadequate force.

Mafeking was a trade center for its area and had been the center for the region's government. It had a railway line running to it, but was at the bottom of a valley, which made it very difficult to defend. What made it worse, there were no natural defenses in the town, like rivers, hills, or forests. England came to watch this town with interest during the siege, and Baden-Powell's incredible game of bluff won him a hero's status. But things did not look good during the siege. Baden-Powell was out-gunned, ill-equipped, and hopelessly outnumbered. If Mafeking was to hold out, it would only be through Baden-Powell's skill as a military strategist.

Barbed Wire

It was not long before Baden-Powell ran out of barbed wire to protect the city. One Saturday evening as he watched the Boer soldiers leave their trenches for the Sunday cease-fire (no one fought on Sunday), he saw them crawling carefully through the barbed wire, but at that distance, he couldn't actually see the rolls of wire. All he could see were soldiers twisting, ducking, and crawling as they moved back toward their camp. Baden-Powell instructed his men to continue putting up posts, pretending to string rows and rows of barbed wire around Mafeking. From their observation points, the Boers wouldn't know the difference! He taught his men to pretend they were crawling through barbed wire as they left the trenches. This fooled the Boers, who decided that they wouldn't be able to get through barbed wire if they attacked.

Spies

Baden-Powell worried about spies in his town. If the Boers found out about his fake defenses, Mafeking would fall. So Baden-Powell got up early one morning and posted this sign in the village square:

SPIES

There are in town today 9 known spies. They are hereby warned to leave before 12 noon tomorrow, or they will be apprehended.

Of course, he had no way of knowing how many spies were in town. But the trick worked!

Land Mines

Lacking sufficient real land mines, Baden-Powell filled small boxes with sand and had the soldiers bury them all around the outside of the town during daylight so that the Boers would think they were burying land mines. To make sure the trick worked, he took some of the dynamite he actually had and pretended to test his "land mines". Again, the Boers kept their distance, not wanting to run into Baden-Powell's extensive mine fields.

Cannons

One thing Mafeking really lacked was cannons. The Boers lobbed shells from their cannons for days on end, destroying much of the strangled town. Once again, Baden-Powell feared that the Boers would storm his town any day. It was then that he came up with another terrific idea.

He had trenches dug all around the town and built cannon bunkers along Mafeking's perimeter. His soldiers would fire the few cannons they had, and then the town's boys would drag the cannons through the trenches to the next empty cannon bunker, where the soldiers would fire them again. To the Boers, it appeared that Mafeking had dozens of cannons that soldiers were firing at their leisure!

Conclusion

When Troops arrived to liberate Mafeking 217 days into the siege, Baden-Powell returned to England a hero. The country watched his every move, eager to see what the brilliant soldier would do. Boys' organizations all over the country asked him to visit them or write them letters. Through his fame and concern for boys, he eventually started Boy Scouting, and tens of thousands of boys joined to follow their hero, Baden-Powell.
