FARM to TABLE MOVEMENT

The farm to table movement celebrates fixing food with only fresh local ingredients. Food travels from the farm directly to the consumer, skipping the steps of being sold to a supplier, going through wasteful packaging processes, traveling many miles, being shipped to a retailer, and sitting in a store waiting to be purchased for days or even weeks. The movement is popular and important for several reasons. First and foremost, food straight from the field tastes better. The fresher the ingredients, the better the meal is. Local ingredients are also better for the environment as less travel means less energy consumption and less pollution. Small farms tend to use more humane and environmentally friendly practices, raising free-range chickens, grass-fed beef and organic vegetables. Local farms also protect and enrich our culinary and agricultural culture, sowing heirloom seeds and raising heritage breeds so our table is enlivened by the same food traditions that nourished generations that came before us.
